HELENA MAN IN TROUBLE

Francis Murphy Drew a Check That Was Not Any Good-Others Sought Justice and Found It

It was a curious looking array of men that were lined up for arraignment in Judge Rockwell's court yesterday morning. It was a scene that reminded the spectatore of Miss Elizabeth's Thompson's noted picture, "The Roll Call" after the battle. There were six defendants in all, most of whom were sore headed enough to have come from Helena. In each case the defendant plead not guilty and their cases were set for trial in the afternoon. Frank McGowan was the first man tried, boing charged with disturbing the peace in Whitford's saloon by fighting. Mr. McGowan was not as good looking as he appeared to be the night before, Mr. Whitford's strong right arm having guided his fist so that it came in collision with the defendant's left eye. The evidence given by the witnesses for the prosecution did not altogether jibe with Mr. McGowan's idea of the conflict, so he was given a diploma calling for $10 and costs. In default of the amount he was committed to jail for a short time while his friends rustled the cash.

John Collier next came up for judgment on the charge of resisting an officer. Collier was the man who made things so on the charge of resisting an officer. Collier was the man who made things so interesting for the police force Tuesday evening. He was a sorry physically look-ing map: whether or not he was so men-tally could not be learned. His head was cut in several places and both hands were bound up. Someone outside the court whistled in a high pitched key that classic whistled in a high pitched key that classic song that contains words insinuating there is often a slight change in feeling between the night before and the next morning. The prosecution proved a strong case against Collier, which was natural, as he made his mark in the city several distinct times Tuesday evening. The defendant in his own behalf said he was the victim of mistaken identity and "never did nothing." The police officers testifled that Mr. Collier was no maverick, but on the contrary bore the brand of innumerable canes upon his brow, in fact testified that Mr. Collier was no maverick, but on the contrary bore the brand of innumerable canes upon his brow, in fact it would have puzzled the most proficient brand expert to have decided in which police officer's hands he had been last, as the brands had not been properly vented, according to the usual custom in such cases. The defendant said that he did not remember much about the trouble, and his loss of memory regarding some of the most important occurrences was remarkable. Judge Rockwell assessed him $25 and costs for his fun and committed him pending payment.

Patrick Murphy was charged with assault and battery upon John Davey, one of the quarantine officers. Murphy was a friend of Collier, and when the latter was arrested and placed in John Davey's charge, he did the friend in need act by striking Mr. Davey between the eyes with such force that the officer thought for several minutes he had discovered the new comet. Murphy said he did not know that the man he struck was an officer. Judge Rockwell, in pronouncing sentence, held St. John had said, "What can a man do more than die for his friend," or words to that effect, but he did not think that advice fitted Murphy's case, so he imposed a fine of $10 and costs.

John Doe plead guilty to using language more expressive than polite and paid $10 and costs for the privilege. Richard Roe plead guilty to a simple drunk, as distinguished from the genuine old fashioned article known as an uproarious hilarious kind of a time, and was sent to jail in default of $5 and costs.

This ended the city business in the court, but after supper the state took a turn at the bat. Francis Murphy was charged with running a bluff with a check for $10 upon John Barkovich. The check was drawn upon the First National bank of Anaconda, and was said to be valueless except as a curiosity. Murphy thought it for $110 upon John Barkovich. The check was drawn upon the First National bank of Anaconda, and was said to be valueless except as a curiosity. Murphy thought it ought to be good for a dollar, and offered it to Mr. Barkovitch for that sum, but the exalderman does not go much on curios, so handed Murphy over to the officers. The defendant appeared to be in something of a hazey mental condition and pleaded guilty, after which, when he had received a sentence of 30 days in the county jail, he arose and raising his right hand towards heaven declared in the most sacred and solemn manner, calling the Deity to witness that he was innocent. This rather puzzled the court and explanations were asked. Murphy said that he was a machinist and came from Helena a few weeks ago. He hinted at some great trouble that had overtaken him lately and said he had been drinking heavily since that time so that his memory was not very good, but he did not believe he had ever done a dishonest action intentionally. He is a man past middle age, of a respectable appearance, and bears every indication of having passed through trouble of some kind that had left his mind without its usual brightness.

The wind up of Tuesday evening's battles will be heard to-day.

The Last Act in a Life That Was Threwn Away.

There was something inexpressibly sad about the little funeral cortege that left Ehret's undertaking establishment about 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon. There was no hearse with its mournful trappings, but in its stead a delivery wagon was pressed into service. There were no relatives or friends of a past innocent youth anxious to do homage by their attendance to a respected friend and reverence to our immutable God. Only a few of her late associates accompanied the remains of Mary Barrett to her last resting place, and they were probably governed in this action by a feeling of a reciprocal character rather than by one of friendship. They each thought that had they been the express wagon's burden the dead woman with her other sisters in sin would have paid the same show of respect towards their departure. Many people who watched the procession made remarks about wasted lives, while a few others were inclined to jeer, a common mode of cloaking a train of higher feelings working beneath the surface. Funerals always appeal in a peculiar manner to the spectators, and one of this character doubly so, as it leaves open to the imagination as much of the tragic and broken-hearted side of life, that is so seldom open to the public gaze, and is generally confined to the realms of fiction.

This afternoon the register and receive at the Missoula office received telegraphic orders from Ed A. Bowers, assistant land commissioner at Washington, to allow no entries by whites in township 25, north of range 21, until Indian claims are adjusted to official survey. This refers to the Indian allotments made on Day-Indian allotments made on Dayton creek, amounting in all to 19 claims of 160 acres each,
which were made to individual Indians about two years since and which have given the Indian department considerable trouble, by white settlers persisting in locating on them. The Indian allotments were made by meets and bounds previous to and without reference to the official to and without reference to the official survey. These will all be adjusted and made to correspond to the government survey before any of the white settlers on township 25 north, of range 21 west, can get any kind of title to their land.
